After more than 324,000 people signed a petition opposing the idea, UK vaccine minister Nadhim Zahawi said that vaccinating people without documentation is not the plan. That turned out to be a complete falsehood.

That turned out to be a complete falsehood.

As the Spectator reports today, “Responsibilities have been divided between government departments to look at the idea for Transport will be told to draw up plans for a certificate for international travel. NHS will be told to prepare to let people access their records for international travel.”

Sky News reports that Foreign Secretary Dominic Raab has announced a proposal but that there’s a “nervousness” within government about announcing it publicly.

“The UK Government, like most nations, wants to operate in a responsible safe and fair manner and we continue to work in a responsible manner,” government spokesperson said. “We want to ensure that we have a recognised approach to enable travel and are working with our partners to do so.”

Part of this “nervousness” is based around the perception that a requirement for travel could be seen as racist because suspicion of vaccine rates are commonplace within BAME communities.

The Spectator’s Lara Prendergast suggests that the government is considering exemptions to people from ethnic minorities by granting exemptions to people from ethnic minorities.

“Polls say that about 85% of British adults are ‘likely to get vaccinated’ but 15% have concerns,” writes Prendergast. “People with medical reasons might be granted an exemption. But according to Zahawi, “skew heavily towards BAME communities in the prospect of vaccine passports deepening racial divisions.” The Government decides to grant certain exemptions.”

Perhaps those who don’t wish to take the vaccine but identify as black, announcing themselves as “transracial” to get an exemption.
